We are grateful to the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA) and to the American Journal of Orthopsychiatry (AJO) for supporting the development of this special section on parenting and homelessness. We thank Deborah Stone, Ph.D., of the Homeless Programs Branch for her guidance and unwavering support.

Nancy Felipe Russo, Ph.D., editor of the American Journal of Orthopsychiatry, welcomed this project from the beginning and was very helpful in facilitating its completion. We would also like to thank the journal's editorial staff members for their ongoing assistance. Dawn Jahn Moses of the National Center on Family Homelessness and Justine Hanson, Ph.D., of the Center for Social Innovation also provided substantial editorial support, and we thank them sincerely. Finally, we thank all the individuals who submitted and reviewed manuscripts for this special section. We appreciate their hard work and commitment to addressing the tragedy of homelessness and the critical role of parents in the lives of their children.

The development of this special section was funded by a generous contract (Homelessness Resource Center, Contract No. HHSS280200600029C) from the Homeless Programs Branch, Division of Service and Systems Improvement, Center for Mental Health Services, Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration.

The reader may earn 10 continuing education/continuing medical education (CE/CME) credits by reading this accredited AJO section and passing a test on its content (see p. v for further information and instructions for obtaining credit). The American Orthopsychiatric Association (AOA) is accredited by the Accreditation Council for Continuing Medical Education to provide continuing medical education for physicians. The AOA designates this educational activity for 10 American Medical Association Physician's Recognition Award (AMA PRA) Category 1 Credits™. Physicians should only claim credit commensurate with the extent of their participation in an activity. CE/CME section credit is given for reading the section as a whole, and all articles in a given section must be read to receive section credit.
